"Anyone planning a wilderness trip should read "Simple Foods for the Pack."--"The New York Times

Claudia Axcell is a former trail guide and professional baker, and Vikki Kath is a photographer and professional cook. Both live in Sebastopol, California. Diana Cooke, a graduate of the Cordon Bleu in London, makes her home in Bishop, California.

This is an overall good cookbook for true backpack camping. Some of the recipes are somewhat bland and need some spicing up with herbs and other powdered spices. Other recipes you can substitute alternate ingredients say for example the Anzacs cookie recipe. Instead of coconut try adding almond meal in roughly the same amount that is asked for in the recipe. The fat is reduced in the Anzacs and you have now added some protein to the cookie. If you are a good cook you'll see where you can add things to recipes that need a little livening up. I especially like the recipes that call for putting all the dry ingredients in a ziploc bag and then adding water at camp. Saves time and keeps the pack light. Why eat expensive freeze dried food when you can make really good recipes ahead of time?

There are tons of recipes for vegans/vegetarians. Some recipes are good for everyday home use, too. The book has a staples section, camping cook tools section, and a nice menu preparation idea section. There are pocket energy foods, main entrees, breads, sauces, cakes, drink mixes, and much more. A natural first aid kit and resource guide are also included. The book is compact for packing, but not microprint for those of us over 40! You can't beat the price for 287 pages of useful information. A few days of preparation for camping and you will eat foods that don't taste like cardboard. Your campmates will be jealous.

This book focuses on how to bring normal foods from the flexitarian kitchen on 3-5 day camping and backpacking trips. If miso, soba, quinoa, and tahini are normally in your pantry this book will show you how to prepare them, mix them, and pack them for enjoyable meals in the woods.

Good book. Has many good recipes and lots of variety instead of the same recipes just tweaked. As was mentioned by another reviewer, it has vegetarian/vegan friendly recipes and those that can easily be made that way. I don't love all the recipes but many of them gave me great ideas for my own meals.

I had this book years ago as part of a backpacking class in college. I lost it and was happy to find it again so I could re-try the simple recipes.

Simple, easy, fast trail recipes. Excellent.

My copy of the book is the first edition, old school green covered 70's version (the one that had you cooking brown rice and lentils on the trail). If you want to do organic, whole grains and you don't mind more extensive cooking this book could be what you want.

I have used an earlier version on the trail and found the recipes very acceptable. They can also be used with fresh ingredients where available, for example, at home. I could not find the book in Australia.
